Professional Diploma in " Public Policy and Child Rights "

The Hashemite University policies and strategies assure the cooperation between the university and the local, Arab and international universities, for achieving the highest quality of teaching and learning. Initiating a University Diploma program on Public Policy and Child Rights at the Hashemite University can lay the foundation for sustainability of building institutional capacity in the higher education system in Jordan to promote child's rights.

What is the Diploma in Public Policy & Child Rights (DPPCR)?

Starting Spring of the 2010-2011 academic year, two universities in Jordan (The Hashemite University & The University of Jordan), and two in Egypt (Cairo University & Assiut University) will be offering advanced professional graduate diploma titled: Diploma in Public Policy & Child Rights (DPPCR). This Degree is offered through cooperation between the Higher Education institutions in Jordan, Egypt and the European Union (The United Kingdom, Germany, and the Netherlands).

Diploma in Public Policy & Child Rights (DPPCR) is hosted by the Queen Rania Faculty for Childhood at The Hashemite University / Jordan, and is based on the United Nations "Convention on the Rights of the Child". The Diploma has been established in response to the need for relevant and appropriate child-friendly legislation, policies, budgets, and programmes that are developed to respect, protect and fulfill the rights of all children in Jordan.

Who is it meant for?

DPPCR is targeted at policy makers, service providers, researchers, students, civil servants, journalists, activists and other people working with and for children. It aims at building students' knowledge and skills needed to make legislation, policies, budget and programmes that will enable students to become strong advocates for child rights.

What makes the DPPCR special?

This Diploma is different from other diplomas offered in various ways. It will:

- Teach courses that are interdisciplinary in nature and include fields such as economics, political science, public policy, law, sociology, psychology, social welfare, and education;
- Host guest lecturers from the Middle East & North Africa (MENA), and the European partner countries;
- Adopt an approach to continuously improve the course content in a participatory manner between students, instructors and the European partners;
- Combine rigorous class interactions with field research, and bridge the gap between research and practice;
- Use blended learning and new technologies such as video-conferencing.

Professional Diploma in " Public Policy and Child Rights "

- Offer top students an opportunity to attend a free summer internship in Europe so they can interact with peers in similar programmes and work on joint research projects;
- Offer students the chance to network with different stakeholders in the field of children's rights, health, and development cooperation in the MENA region and beyond.
- Allow students to transfer completed credits to European Universities through the ECTS system.

How is this accredited?

This diploma is set for one academic year divided into two semesters.

Four courses will be taught during each semester. Students are required to complete eight courses (24 credit hours) in order to graduate. Part of the graduation requirements is the submission of an honour thesis at the end of the academic year.

It will also be possible for students to transfer these certified credits to partner European universities.
